The harbor town woke slowly. Fishing boats rocked against their moorings while gulls argued over the morning catch.

By nine the market stalls were open, and the smell of fresh bread drifted along the quay toward the old customs house.